I'm glad to be attending the The Alternative In-House Technology Summit in a beautiful venue of Windsor, England. A lot is being discussed about how to make legal technology implementation successful and how to close the gap between technology expectations and delivery. Excellent content and speakers relevant to my current initiatives to transform legal department through innovation, automation and legal tech solutions.

- Key takeaways:
- no legal tech swiss army knife;
  - legal tech market is accelerating but still maturing (and lagging behind other sectors);
  - there is still, and will be, a place for humans!;
  - you are only as good as your data.

When you combine the possibilities of legaltech across the in-house supply chain stages with the economic buying power that the in-house group has, it can only lead to a real shift in the legal services space. Here are my thoughts on the excellent Alternative In-House Technology summit.

Legal in-house technology will challenge existing legal service models you for setting the out Simon, for those of us not lucky enough to have been spotlighted, there is a chasm between what legal tech has to offer and what companies are doing in practice. Part of the problem is that each company has its needs (including process and culture - people dynamics as you do...see more

 Thanks for your comments Dana. Completely agree with your points about needing to shift from being a supplier centric and process driven to needing to be customer centric and outcome driven

A great day at The Alternative In-House Technology Summit yesterday!

Crafty Counsel partnered up with Alternative, resulting in a super-hectic and very exciting day of interviews with Legal Ops and In-House leaders on technology, communication and cultural change.

Great to see so many of our former interviewee "Crafty friends" as well as "you've been Craftied" the right strapline!

And thanks to Derek Southall for the shout-out on Crafty Counsel at your keynote. Watch this space (follow our company page!) for the final result!
